| Description | | | |
| The method errorAction() in ActionController contains code that does three jobs: <ul style="list-style-type: none">- adding the error flash messages- redirecting back to the original request- outputting a flattened validation error messages As one might wish to override one or more of these aspects, but not c&p the whole code, these concerns should be moved to separate methods that are called from errorAction(). | | | |

[TASK] Decouple responsibilities in default errorAction()

The default errorAction() implementation in ActionController does quite a few things, e.g. rendering an error message and forwarding back to the original request. When implementing an own error action, this might be unhandy, because the default error message is not so useful, while the whole request back-forwarding stuff works quite neat. This commit therefore moves the different parts into their own methods, which are called by errorAction(). Each of these calls can then be used or omitted in custom implementations of errorAction().
