In CMS backend the database mountpoints limit the visible content. In Neos we only have that concept in the tree, but by browsing the site all other content could still be opened. This means the 'mount points' should also restrict modify permissions outside that part of the tree.

To have flexibel control over the permissions we need to be able to add multiple roles to a resource / part of the node tree. That's a BIG downside of the current implementation in CMS (which can be fixed by using be acs which comes with the price of performance penalties). As fine grained acs could be a bad performing thing: maybe we should by default only allow simple permissions (1 group for a tree) and only enable the more advanced (and heavier) features if configured by the integrator.
